Prerequisites: None

Course Description: The content of this course is constructed to study the general methodology of sociology as a science. The fundamental understanding of sociological philosophies, and their historical development and influence will be a central focus of the course. The class is designed to give a broad and effective coverage of sociological history, sociological theory and thought, methods of sociological research, culture, socialization, society, race and ethnic relations, social inequality, sex and gender, deviance, social change and the sociology of information technology.

To successfully complete this course the student will be able to:

• Discuss the general issues surrounding sociology as a science
• Describe the past practices and philosophies of sociology and contrast them with present trends
• List and describe the three major philosophic and scientific branches of sociology
• Define the methodology of sociological research and the context in which it is used to understand social issues
• Identify and describe the methods of influential sociological theorists
• List and identify the basic terminologies of sociology
• Define the ways in which sociology is used to understand social change
• Describe the unique features of sociology as a social science
• Compare and contrast sociology with other social sciences

Upon completion of this course the student will be able to:

• Retain and discuss valuable information regarding sociology
• Express communicative and written skills
• Successfully complete assigned academic tasks
• Pursue knowledge as a life long endeavor
Course Content and Organization

Course Structure: This course will be a combination of class lecture, possible guest lectures, videos, discussions, and assigned readings. Three exams will be given during the semester, including the final, which will not be comprehensive.

Course Policies: The college and instructor require regular attendance. Absences equaling more than THREE HOURS of instruction may result in the student losing points or being dropped from the class. This policy includes being excessively late or leaving early. In the event a student is faced with a legitimate need to miss class, please contact the instructor.
